Parable

To The Editor: I believe your sobbing editorial in defense of the suspected Communist being investigated by the Subversive Activities Control Board needs a little light.

In contrast, there was no emotion, nor was there any objection, by your paper to Castro executing three United States CIA agents about three weeks ago. The news item was buried in the back pages of your paper. Of course, we all realize that such items come in too late to be headlined or printed on the front page, which is about all most people read. It would be interesting to read the transcript of THEIR trial. In communist eyes they were criminals for spying on the "people's government" of Cuba.

Here is my answer to your defense of those who would destroy our form of government: Once upon a time there was a simple minded farmer plowing his field early in the spring when the frost was still in the ground. He plowed up a poisonous hibernating snake. He knew if he left it exposed it would perish. Being soft hearted as well as soft headed he carried the snake to his home and put it in a box behind the old fashioned wood stove (a poverty pocket no doubt). Soon the snake was warm, comfortable and fully awake. It crawled from the box and proceeded to bite the farmer's innocent children. They died in agony caused by the poisonous lies: subversion, blackmail and murder of communism.
